How can educators and therapists best support individuals with neurodevelopmental disabilities and their families? Our growing understanding of neurodiversity can provide guidance and direction. All human beings have uneven developmental profiles due to neurodevelopmental differences. However, for people with autism and more pronounced neurodevelopmental differences, strengths and challenges may be more pronounced, especially in areas related to social communication and emotional regulation.

Using meaningful examples, this presentation will discuss and give examples of productive and supportive ways to identify and capitalize on strengths, enhance social communication competence and confidence, support emotional regulation, build trust and empower individuals with autism and related neurodevelopmental disabilities. This approach is in stark contrast to "deficit-checklist" approaches designed to "fix" individuals.

LEARNER OBJECTIVES:

1. Participants will be able to define neurodiversity.
2. Participants will be able to describe a strength-based approach to education and support.
3. Participants will be able to apply their deeper understanding of the "WHY" of "behaviors" that may appear different, and in some cases, considered to be "challenging", especially those involving social communication.
4. Participants will be able to apply implications for support in the context of the family and in educational and community settings.
5. Participants will be able to identify and apply the essential components of a neurodiversity perspective, including the importance of supporting a person's "enthusiasms" and self-awareness, in addition to building self-esteem and positive relationships.
